

Large Werweissen to fencing

St. Moritz | Thursday, 11 August 2011

A small strip of land at the St. Moritz is currently open for speculation, assumptions and explanations. The EP / PL, 11 August is the mystery at the track.

In St. Moritz-Bad, right along the lakefront path towards dairy, passers-by a curious sight presented itself. At the foot of a slope there is a fenced area of deep black soil, which is in contrast to the surrounding lush landscape. The Werweissen to the background of this latest Engadine arable field was found with so many people walking and fertile ground for avid walkers guesswork.

The wine lover wonders already full of hope that does well to create a wine Grisons a new vineyard. At the (apart from the shadow slope) for vines could carry a suitable lake or vineyard terrace on West Swiss model has flourished. The vine is basically the toughest, most adaptable and undemanding plant. The question remains whether the champagne climate of St. Moritz offers possibly also ideal wine growing conditions. At present, the friend of fine wines mature content with deeper layers. With a height of up to 1150 meters above sea level the highest vineyards in Europe are below Visperterminen in the Upper Valais. Makes the "Top of the World" wine enthusiasts the Welshmen dispute that title soon?

also as an agricultural field, the field could be titled by the lake. Given the uncertain global economic situation, the memories of growing battle during the Second World War are awake. At that time, the promotion of intra-Swiss food crops has been pursued in order to avert the threat of an embargo on food shortages. Just makes the currency situation currently in the region for big headaches. Consequently, this assumption is not necessarily used in the air?

But that's not enough of the hypotheses, because the Hobbyarcheologe senses a sensation. It has long been known that St. Moritz in the Middle Bronze Age popular spa. The mineral springs were used already proven in the Middle Bronze Age. The source version used to build the trees during the period between the 14th and 17 Century before Christ like. Witnesses from this period are also bronze swords and other found objects, which are likely to be the source for votive offerings to deities. Possibly the outlines of a bathing beach found pre-historic value?

Allotments for St. Moritz-Bad

puzzling phenomena such as this always call back and conspiracy theorists, pseudo scientists and representatives of the so-called pre-astronautics at the scene. However, where the characters identify patterns of ominous piece of land at best a new form of crop circles? For residents of the lake area has also been announced quietly hoping to cozy allotments for St. Moritz-Bad. If the quality of life for local people soon sweetened by such allotments?

allotments are superficial at this site but no more accurate as all other dreams and assumptions set forth herein. To press this issue paper is not allowed to verify the speculation and the solution to the puzzle is finally, as so often happens in art. With the upcoming St. Moritz Art Masters will occur at this idyllic location is a work of Chinese artist Jennifer Wen Ma. Over several days to break out a thin layer of soft green grass from the black soil and finally reveal the two words "Amor Fati". The term coined by the philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche in Latin means something like "love of fate" and can be used as the affirmation of the necessary skill understood as a sign of human greatness. The artwork of Jennifer Wen Ma is part of project Lingua Franca, which during the Art Masters of 28 August to 4 September public art shows. The EP / PL remains with regard to possible further sensational discoveries and conversion projects still on the ball
